TOPIC: SEXUALITIES AND JUSTICE

This course will focus on Supreme Court cases that have affected LGBTQ rights in the United States—from Bowers v. Hardwick (1985), which confirmed that states could criminalize gay and lesbian relationships, to Obergefell v. Hodges (2015), which granted marriage equality to same-sex couples, to Bostock v. Clayton County (2020), which included sexual orientation and gender identity in the scope of employment protection. Throughout we will consider how ideas of justice and injustice are linked to the lived experiences of LGBTQ people, and to their changing legal and social status. Along with the court decisions, we will examine selected and relevant nonfiction, literary, and film texts that explore LGBTQ lives. We will also consider, where possible, relevant state and international contexts.

TOPIC: LANGUAGE, GENDER, AND SEXUALITY

Language and identity are intricately interconnected. This course explores the relationship between language, gender, and sexuality and how language use mediates the social constructions of gender and sexuality, in daily practice and in social institutions. Drawing on interdisciplinary scholarship, the course provides a broad perspective and tools for the study of gender, sexuality, and linguistic practice.

Topics covered will include: ideologies of gender and language; cultural definitions and ‘borders’ of “masculinity” and “femininity” and their relationship to language use; gendered patterns in conversation, politeness, and meaning-making; linguistic innovation and self-determination within gender-diverse speech communities; and the interaction between language, gender, sexuality and other aspects of identity. We will cover the different theoretical and methodological approaches that have developed within linguistics in the last four decades to understand the complex role language plays in producing, sustaining, and perpetuating gender and sexual divisions in society, as well as the potential to challenge and transform them.

TOPIC: GENDER AND SEXUALITY

This senior seminar gender and sexuality in America will expose students to major themes and scholarly literature, requiring them to write a long essay (approximately 20 pages) based on primary research. Topics of discussion will include issues such as changing gender ideologies over time, political movements for women's equality and LGBTQ rights, and gender stereotypes in popular culture. This course is not all-inclusive in terms of coverage; while students are invited to write about any aspect of gender and sexuality, there are many areas of scholarship, and groups that will not be explored. Rather, readings stand as models for effective ways to research American gender and sexuality from an interdisciplinary, intersectional perspective.
